Envisioning a Post-Crisis Regional Order in the Sharq Region

8 - 9 October 2016

Conference Description
It is important to mark the Sykes-Picot agreement on its 100-year anniversary not only because it was one of the founding charters of the state system of the modern Middle East, a milestone marking the ending of one era and beginning of another, but also because this anniversary comes while the whole region is subject to dramatic events resulting from what seems to be “a big failure” in the modern state project in the region. The central government has collapsed in many states and primordial identities and loyalties (religious, tribal, racial, and sectarian) have returned to surface after recession of the concept of citizenship. Moreover, the role of non-state actors (or maybe pre-state actors) such as the tribe, the sect, and militant groups has become dominant in many countries. Therefore, it is of paramount importance to revisit the Sykes-Picot agreement on its centennial anniversary in an attempt to understand the underlying causes of this catastrophic collapse of order in the Sharq region and to come up with lessons learned from accumulated historical experience while we grope for a way to bring order back to the region and to establish a new Al-Sharq system.

Indeed, the final configuration of the Middle East was not that of the Sykes-Picot agreement, but the agreement represented the first draft, the seed of what was later to be implemented. Yet, what is noteworthy in this agreement is that the fate of one of the most sensitive and diverse regions in the world and millions of its inhabitants was entrusted to two middle-ranking British and French officials to decide. At no point between the signing of the Sykes-Picot agreement and the St. Remo agreement, which was to shape the modern Middle East, was there any consultation of the peoples of the region.

The consequences of dividing the Middle East using lines drawn by the imperialist powers without consulting the peoples of the region have been disastrous: weak states; divided ethnic and confessional groups; inter-state mistrust and conflicts; a lack of a national basis for the newly-emerging states, etc. Only Turkey, thanks to its war of independence, succeeded in saving what remained of the Ottoman sultanate from the fate of the rest of the Middle East. To compensate for this deficit in legitimacy, the social base of the ruling class got narrower, ruling regimes came to dominate state institutions, and the police and security branches of the state became the main instruments of control.

By the first decade of the 21st century, the position of the modern Middle Eastern state and the regional order from which it was born had become untenable, as manifested by the wave of revolutions and movements for democratic change that swept the region and turned into civil wars. The chaos created by the widening conflicts between regional powers, exacerbated by the return of direct foreign interventions, reflects a lack of strategic vision combined with the short-sightedness of the policies pursued by local actors. Therefore, the pressing question is: how and through which means can peoples of the region work freely together to decide their own future and reshape the state and the regional order? Now, what is firmly required is a consensual vision that establishes stability and prosperity, transcends the deadly hurdles of the current borders, responds to forces of identity, and guarantees freedom and basic human rights.

PLENARY I: Breaking the Cycle of Crisis: How to Reach a Post-Crisis Phase in the Region?
Where to begin in order to break the vicious cycle of violence of all forms, sectarian conflicts, extremism, political authoritarianism, economic regression, and social decadence in the region? How should we address the questions of failed states, sterile political projects, legitimacy, democracy and rule of law? International powers, are they pouring gunpowder or water on the fire in the region?

Parallel Sessions I

Discerning the Present through the Past
This session will aim to deal with the following themes and questions: The origins of the post-World War I regional order and the crisis of the modern state in the Middle East; authoritarian rule, party politics, religion and politics, identity politics and sectarianism, the phenomenon of failed states, civil-military relations.

Competing Ideologies: Regional Ideological Projects
This session will focus on the competing visions for the remaking of the regional order in Middle East: Pan Arabism, Pan Islamism, National identities, Sectarian Agendas. What do each of these different ideological projects offer the region and its people? How feasible are their visions? What should be the nature of the relationship between these ideological projects and a new social contract for the countries/societies of the region?
Dealing with Questions of Minorities and Majorities in the Region

One of the often-heard criticisms of the post-Sykes-Picot order is that it didn’t pay sufficient attention to the geographies of identity in the region. This has been held up as one of the main shortcomings of the post-Sykes-Picot order. It has also been cited by many as the proof of the superficiality of the post-Sykes-Picot order and the borders that it imposed. This reading has produced two types of response: whereas minority groups such as the Kurds (particularly the Iraqi Kurds) have argued that drawing new borders will undo the historical injustices resulting from the Sykes Picot agreement, majority groups such as Pan-Arabist or Pan-Islamists have argued for the eradication of current borders in order to establish greater entities. These two currents seem to have produced many grievances and much anxiety and tension across the region. How should the nature of polities and states in the region change to allow the accommodation and appreciation of different identities? What kind of policies and approaches should the countries in the region pursue in order to address questions of minorities and majorities? Is it superficial borders or bad politics that cause so much grievance for minority groups and anxiety for majority groups? How can the dilemma of minorities versus majorities be settled?

Parallel Sessions II

Indigenous Attempts to Reshape the MENA

Major countries in the Middle East have different designs for a regional order. Turkey, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Israel all have different contending visions for how the region ought to be restructured. What are the main features of these visions? Can they be reconciled with each other? How does rivalry between these different visions of the region shape regional political and security contours? In addition, this session will examine post-World War II attempts at establishing supranational regional institutions, e.g., the Arab League, the Organisation of Islamic Cooperation, the Gulf Cooperation Council, etc. Different political and economic organizations in the Al-Sharq region that attempt to promote cooperation and integration between its countries will be studied in order to explore their major achievements and the main challenges they have faced.

International Power and Regional Order in the MENA

From the mandate era up until the greater Middle East project, how has the nature of the relationship between the major international powers and the MENA region changed? How influential are international powers in the MENA region? Between full domination and impotence, where do major international powers stand? Are there any new international players in the MENA region? How important the roles major international organizations (the IMF, World Bank, and UN) are playing in the MENA region? Has the role of international powers and organizations been constructive or destructive in the MENA region? How can mutually beneficial relationships between international powers and MENA region be established?

Socio-Economic Drivers of the Regional Crisis

How prevalent and serious are economic and social discontentment in countries of the region? How can they be best addressed? What kind of policies should the countries in the region pursue in order to deal with growing numbers of young people, burgeoning economic inequality, skyrocketing unemployment, and a rising tide of radicalism? What are the prospects for cooperation among and between regional countries, international institutions and powers?
9 October 2016

Private Sessions
Working groups will convene in workshop format to produce analysis and policy recommendations. These sessions will be closed to public and by invitation only. Al Sharq Forum will present the outcomes in reports shortly after the conference.

PLENARY II: Envisioning the Future: Scenarios and Realities
Toward a new, consensual vision for a regional order: out of all these chaotic structures, organizations, projects and theories, this theme tries to offer a futuristic perspective on how to build an efficient regional order, capable of achieving political stability and promoting economic integration and regional cooperation in new Al-Sharq. What should/can be the general contours of the social contract of the Sharq region? At the same time, this session will not remain oblivious to the realities of the region. Instead, it aims to engage in an intellectual exercise of considering possible scenarios for the region without losing the sight of the reality and constraints going forward.
Upcoming Events

Europe’s Changing Neighbourhood – Conflict Prevention and Management in the 21st Century

14 November 2016 - London, UK

Event Description

The second annual conference on Europe’s Changing Neighbourhood, organised by Al Sharq Forum in partnership with Chatham House and International Crisis Group, will assess the effectiveness and external perceptions of Europe’s collective and national-level responses to the crises in its neighbourhood. It will also consider how Europe can use its political and social capacity to manage the current crisis environment. Responding to Turkey’s Failed Coup: Implications for European Engagement with the Middle East

22 September 2016- London, UK

Event Description
On the wake of the failed coup attempt in Turkey, the workshop aimed at addressing the implications of the failed coup attempt in Turkey. It also shed light on how it would play out in the regional issues with respect of the European Turkish relations and the reverberations occurring in the region. The question of democracy in the Middle East and the European efforts was also a pivotal topic discussed at the workshop.
Al Sharq Forum & Foreign Affairs Live Event: Sykes Picot At 100

3 June 2016- Washington D.C.

Event Description
A century ago, a secret agreement between France and Britain carved the Middle East into spheres of influence supervised by the two superpowers. The Sykes-Picot agreement hastily divided the territory of the former Ottoman empire into a map that did not correspond to the ethnic, tribal or sectarian distinctions on the ground. The joint event organized by Al Sharq Forum and Foreign Affairs looked back at the legacy of the treaty that defined and divided the Middle East. The event brought together experts from the public and private sectors to examine the profound consequences of Sykes-Picot today, as well as the contemporary policy recommendations to address its consequences.
Rethinking Violent Extremism in the MENA Region

9 April 2016- Istanbul, Turkey

Event Description
Al Sharq Forum in cooperation with The Afro-Middle East Centre (AMEC) held a conference in Istanbul - Turkey. The conference aimed at discussing the issue of extremism in the MENA region and its dynamics as to how to approach the future threats in this phenomenon. During the two-day events five panels were presented and experts and analysts from different fields presented insight to the issue, formulating strategic approaches towards the extremism threat in the MENA region.
“What Are the Implications of Regional Developments and Turmoil on the Palestinian Issue?”

14 March 2016- Geneva, Switzerland

Event Description
The workshop was based upon the question of: What are the implications of regional developments and turmoil on the Palestinian issue? During the conference three sessions were conducted and experts from different regions discussed the Palestinian issue. Different aspects of the Palestinian question were put forward and the challenges, threats and the future of the region were examined as well.
